

Food Chain in the Rainforest

Once upon a time, there was an earthworm that lived in a small little worm city deep in the rainforest. There were a parrot, a viper, and some dangerous sea animals living in the rainforest at the same time. They all lived in the big rainforest, preying on each other for food when they find one. One day, the earthworm popped out of his little city to search for food and to breathe some fresh air. Unluckily there was a parrot sitting on the branch of the tree next to the worm city, eyeing the earthworm that had come out as food. The parrot took its chance. It flew down, captured the earthworm and ate it up.

While the parrot is resting and digesting the earthworm, the snake came slithering along, saw the parrot and wanted to eat it. The snake sneaked up on the parrot by slithering closer to the tree and finally going up to the branch. In a flash, the snake ate the whole parrot. The snake slithered to the dangerous river to rest and have a drink. One of the sea animals, under the river, looked at the snake hungrily. Since the sea animals could not go on to land, they waited for the snake to make a move. The snake wanted to take a swim in the water so it went into the river, unaware of the dangerous sea animals. The dangerous sea animals ate the snake.
